Information Form (please read the guidelines carefully on the website www-csc.utt.fr) Supervisor's name: [BALS	Research Grants for PhD students from the China Scholarship Council
Status (prof., assistant prof.,): Professor Laboratory: Renouvelable Université de Technologie de Compiègne Website address: www.utc.fr/timr Université de Technologie de Compiègne Website address: www.utc.fr/timr Scientific competence of the supervisor: Food and Process Engineering, Mass transfer modeling, Freezing Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD: 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, III-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopoic and imaging techniques, leading to fine and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of	Information Form (please read the guidelines carefully on the website www-csc.utt.fr)
Laboratory: Transformations Intégrées de la Matière Renouvelable Université de Technologie de Compiègne Website address : Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Teollowed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O., Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page : Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list) : III-9, II-13, V-17 Title : Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Website address : III-9, II-13, V-17 Title : Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Impact of emerging technologiessuch as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determ	Supervisor's	name : BALS Giv	en names : Olivier
Laboratory: Transformations Intégrées de la Matière Renouvelable Université de Technologie de Compiègne Website address : Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Teollowed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O., Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page : Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list) : III-9, II-13, V-17 Title : Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Website address : III-9, II-13, V-17 Title : Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Impact of emerging technologiessuch as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determ
Renouvelable Université de Technologie de Compiègne Website address : Scientific competence of the supervisor: Food and Process Engineering, Mass transfer modeling, Freezing Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD : 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Foollowed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing, Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess Technology/Jolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page : Supervisor's email : olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list) : II-9, II-13, V-17 Title : Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject : The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its	Status (prof., assistant prof.,): Professor
Renouvelable Université de Technologie de Compiègne Website address : Scientific competence of the supervisor: Food and Process Engineering, Mass transfer modeling, Freezing Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD : 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Foollowed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing, Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess Technology/Jolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page : Supervisor's email : olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list) : II-9, II-13, V-17 Title : Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject : The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its	I . I	Transformations Intégrées de la Matière	Website address :
Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD: 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing, Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). 2. Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing, Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Divier. bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): II-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and componise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice c	Laboratory :
Scientific competence of the supervisor: Food and Process Engineering, Mass transfer modeling, Freezing Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD: 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). 2. Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess Technology/volume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product genery, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to fine and more unifo	Institution:	Université de Technologie de Compiègne
Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD: 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum 1. Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing, Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). 2. Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, III-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques (Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more		protonce of the supervisor:	www.utc.fr
Two major publications in the field proposed for the PhD: 1. Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). 2. Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess Technology/Oulme 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructu
Huang, Y., et al. Pulsed Electric Field Assisted Combined Freezing of Carrot Tissue: Preliminary Vacuum Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing mill be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage
Freezing Followed by Supplementary Conventional Freezing. Food Bioprocess Technol 18, 4649–4657 (2025). Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the lo			d Francisco of Counct Ticous Dualinsia and Massure
Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and Bioprocess TechnologyVolume 18, Issue 1, Pages 219 - 230 (2025). Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, u			•
Website address of the personal page: Supervisor's email: Olivier.bals@utc.fr Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): II-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, ultrasound, modeling	Huang, Y., Bals, O. Application of Vacuum Freezing to Improve the Quality of Thawed Carrot Discs; Food and
Description of the research work proposed for a PhD Topic # (see list): III-9, II-13, V-17 Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, ultrasound, modeling			200 (2020).
Title: Impact of emerging technologies on the freezing process of fruits and vegetables: experimental and modeling approaches Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, ultrasound, modeling
Subject: The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, ultrasound, modeling	Description	of the research work proposed for a PhD	Topic # (see list) : II-9, II-13, V-17
The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, ultrasound, modeling
The preservation of fruits and vegetables through freezing and drying is a widely adopted method due to its ability to extend shelf life while maintaining nutritional and sensory quality. However, conventional freezing techniques often result in the formation of large ice crystals, which can damage plant cell structures and compromise texture upon thawing. This research thesis aims to explore how emerging technologies—such as microwaves and ultrasound-assisted freezing—can enhance the efficiency and quality of the freezing process. The study will begin with the optimization of key process parameters, including air temperature and velocity, product geometry, and the biochemical composition of different fruits and vegetables. A particular emphasis will be placed on understanding ice nucleation and crystal growth mechanisms within plant tissues, using microscopic and imaging techniques. Microwave-assisted freezing will be investigated to determine its influence on ice crystal morphology and the potential for reducing freezing time. Similarly, ultrasound technology will be evaluated for its ability to enhance heat and mass transfer, leading to finer and more uniform ice crystal formation. The impact of these technologies will be assessed through a combination of physicochemical, microstructural, and textural analyses, both immediately after freezing and during storage. Water release, firmness, and structural integrity will be monitored over time to evaluate the long-term effects of the freezing Keywords: Freezing, vegetables, microwave, ultrasound, modeling
Deckground required from the applicant t
Background required from the applicant : Process engineering, Chemical engineering, Food Engineering, English (level B1)
Existence of a PDF file detailing the proposal ("yes" or "no") : no (see guidelines on the website www-csc.utt.fr)			no	